“Infinitissimo – The Man Who Fell Through Time”

Technology can be one of the most irrelevant things in the world when women write future fiction. Holly-Jane Rahlens astonishes us in her scenario with other fundamental, socio-cultural ideas. (...) On the whole, it’s a very complex novel if the reader takes a good look and reads carefully. I only hope that readers will do exactly that. (...) So now I’ve read through it once and I’m starting all over again from the top.

“Everlasting” is a thoroughly enjoyable futuristic novel and a poignant love story that transcends time and space.

– Wiebke Hellenbrand, medical doctor and epidemiologist, Berlin

“Everlasting” is a wonderful story with fascinating ideas, for example the loss of the word “I” and Brain Buttons, a kind of mini-computer implanted in everyone’s head. It’s not your everyday teen romance, but it’s also not one of those super serious books for intellectuals. It’s a great new genre somewhere inbetween.

Call it “science fiction for lovers” – the tale of a quest through history to rescue a lost emotion. “Everlasting” blew me away!

– Kate Gladstone, handwriting software developer, Albany, New York

“Everlasting” does a great job at putting the far-fetched genres of science fiction and time travel into a realistic story that wins us over with its fascinating and gripping ideas, as well as with its suspense and humor. Male readers shouldn’t let themselves be put off by the “women’s lit” marketing.

I’ve seldom read such a beautiful love story. (...) At the beginning it was very strange, (in a good sense), to read about Greifswald, especially in the year 2264! But you could really see a “new, modern” world. It was described in such detail!

– Lisa M., student, Greifswald

Such fascinating notions about the world in 250 years! The book was full of brilliant ideas. While reading, I went on and on about them to my friends and daughters. (...) I couldn’t stop reading. I needed to know what would happen — the suspense was kept until the very last page!

Great fun! And excellent sex scenes!
